Market Comments

The Federal Reserve faces heightened uncertainty over the prospect of an additional rate cut amid slowing economic growth, a cooling labor market, and persistent inflation pressures. Less than two weeks ago, markets largely expected the Fed to keep its benchmark rate unchanged at its final meeting of the year, following quarter-point reductions in both September and October. But since then, sentiment has shifted decisively: markets are now pricing in more than an 87% probability of a 25-basis-point cut on 10 December. Although the final decision will largely depend on the substantial volume of data expected as statistical agencies recover from the record 43-day government shutdown, other indicators, like the ISM Manufacturing PMI, point to contracting manufacturing activity. Against this backdrop of continued macroeconomic volatility, profit rates are expected to decline gradually in line with anticipated Fed rate cuts.
